Later Nineteenth Century: 1830-1914 - Oxford Scholarship

This chapter discusses technological change and economic growth in the late nineteenth century. It notes that during this period, the complexity of technological systems increased, and examples of networks are found in the railroads; in the electricity, telegraph, telephone, and water-supply systems; and in the need to supply spare parts and information to individuals. Simultaneous with the ...

This review article looks at the recent books on the British Industrial Revolution by Robert Allen and Joel Mokyr. Both writers seek to explain Britain's primacy.

This article offers a critical but sympathetic account of the main arguments of the two authors, considering both the economic logic and the empirical validity of their rival claims.

Explaining the first Industrial Revolution: two views ...

Recent historians have undermined the idea of an 'Industrial Revolution 1780-1830'. The rate of economic growth between 1780 and 1830 was much slower than previously thought. There was significant industrialisation in Britain before 1780. Some sectors of the economy grew, eg. textiles, iron and coal, but the rest stayed stagnant, or grew very ...
