Rethinking The European Union Rethinking

The refugee situation in the European Union in recent years, widely perceived as a refugee “crisis”, has been marked by a series of migrant boat tragedies in the Mediterranean Sea. Such tragedies notwithstanding, the rhetoric of “crisis” is often used to suggest an overwhelming influx of asylum seekers and thus emphasises the challenges faced by receiving countries (Chetail, 2016).

The Common European Asylum System (CEAS) was set up to create a fair and efficient common asylum policy across the EU. However, my research suggests instead that the CEAS is premised upon containment policies which seek to shift the responsibility for processing asylum applications outside of the European Union

(EU) and undermine non-refoulement protection for asylum claimants and refugees.
