Hostility toward women is an established risk factor for sexual violence and is often found to be present in men prone to sexual transgression. There are also clinical indications that high-risk rapists may have more ambivalent attitudes toward women, including the strong desire to be positively evaluated by women.

Potential and Felt Ambivalence and Sexual Decisions. Muehlenhard and Peterson (2005) describe a “missing discourse of ambivalence” in the literature on sexual decision making, stating that sex is seldom either wanted or unwanted, but is often both (p. 15). They argue that gaining a more complete understanding of sexual decision making necessitates viewing sexual encounters as contexts in ...
