The first purpose made men's wristwatches were created in the early 1900s by the paradoxical move of putting a savonnette movement into a specially made Lépine case, which I explain at purpose made wristwatches. But this was not difficult technically, and it certainly didn't hold up the use of wristwatches by men.

In the 1880s, Girard-Perregaux produced wristwatches for German Naval Officers, and by the time the Boer War was underway (at the turn of the century), there were a handful of manufacturers making wristwatches for soldiers, too. During this time, there were also watches that weren't being built for the military at all.

History of watches - Wikipedia

The pocket watch trend continued even after British Army officers began to wear wristwatches in the 1880s out of a need to synchronize attacks, and because it was far more convenient to refer to one's wrist than it was to pull out a pocket watch during the heat of battle.

Watch Evolution - The Progress of Wristwatches | Worthy.com

By the mid nineteenth century, most watchmakers produced a range of wristwatches, often marketed as bracelets, for women. [26] Wristwatches were first worn by military men towards the end of the nineteenth century, when the importance of synchronizing maneuvers during war without potentially revealing the plan to the enemy through signaling was increasingly recognized.
